Nashville, Tenn., Sept. 20, 1862.

The Peace Autumn.

Thank God for rest, who made me most.

And one who makes afraid,

Revealed, the merciful shelter.

Bright and gay the sun's rays,

The bright sun's rays,

And beat them at the blackman's forge.

To shingle houses over our plains.

All this benefits our hills of snow,

And white when cotton flowers,

After the frost, when the frost is gone,

Are freedom's most powerful blow.

If freedom's power fails,

He is mighty indeed.

Build up an altar to the Lord,

O gracious fruits of ours!

And let us all be ready to reward

That ever drench the showers.

Then let the common heart keep time,

To such an author as you,

As we sing, as we play,

Or thrum on singer's lute;

Let singing breasts call,

The hearts of men to bind.

WHITEHEAD.

General Jackson.

From the Jackson (Miss.) News.

All Americans are familiar with the sonorous name of Andrew Jackson; yet very few know how it was earned by boldness here. I happen to be able to inform your readers.

In 1813 I was unfortunately acquainted with Colonel John Allen, United States Agent of the Indians, whose Indian name was also John Allen, and Captain William A. Allen, then a merchant in that town. I learned from Capt. Wm. Allen, after that his father had been killed in the battle of New Orleans, that he was a friend of General Jackson, and that he and his brother John served as soldiers in his army. He was a man of great energy, and met and milled with him during the Creek war. They were certainly great heroes for their friendship by giving them heroic appointments in the Chickasaw nation which was then in a state of rebellion. I saw Capt. Wm. Allen after General Jackson on one occasion. I asked how he acquired the name of "Old Hickory." He gave me reply, as follows: "I am a Cherokeee, in words."

A song of praise to him we filled,

The stars uplift and sail;

Our bark is well, our ship is well;

Let singing breasts call,

The hearts of men to bind.
